Biography

For more than two decades, Megan Dixon has been helping clients all over the world and across a variety of industries to identify, investigate, and strategically address potential legal exposure arising from criminal or regulatory violations within their businesses.

Megan draws on her past experience as a law clerk, federal prosecutor, and Harvard Law School faculty member to help leverage her perspective on dealing with regulators, witnesses, and others in high-stakes matters where it is critical to quickly determine what happened and actively advise clients on the most effective strategies for responding to their crises.

Megan was working at the U.S. Department of Justice Antitrust Division during the 1990s when international antitrust cartel enforcement came into being, and she has continued to dedicate a significant portion of her years in private practice to advising, speaking, and writing about cartel matters, while simultaneously developing substantial investigations experience in the financial services, technology, and life sciences industries, among others.

Commended by Chambers USA, clients note that Megan is "just outstanding" and single out her "excellent criminal and cartel work." She is also recognized in Legal 500 US where sources call her "very
