Global Competition Review is delighted to publish 2018 edition of The European, Middle Eastern & African Antitrust Review, one of a series of three special reports that have been conceived to deliver specialist intelligence and research to our readers – general counsel, government agencies and private practice lawyers – who must navigate the world’s increasingly complex competition regimes.

Like its sister reports, The Antitrust Review of the Americas and The Asia-Pacific Antitrust Review, The European, Middle Eastern & African Antitrust Review provides an unparalleled annual update, from competition enforcers and leading practitioners, on key developments in the field.

In preparing this report, Global Competition Review has worked with leading competition lawyers and government officials. Their knowledge and experience – and above all their ability to put law and policy into context – give the report special value. We are grateful to all of the contributors and their firms for their time and commitment to the publication.

Although every effort has been made to ensure that all the matters of concern to readers are covered, competition law is a complex and fast-changing field of practice, and therefore specific legal advice should always be sought. Subscribers to Global Competition Review will receive regular updates on any changes to relevant laws over the coming year.

European Union: State Aid

Hogan Lovells International LLP

Introduction: The concept of state aid

State aid law is a genuine concept of EU law that forms part of the competition law rules laid down in articles 107-109 et seq of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union (TFEU). In a single market as in the EU, state aid rules are vital to prevent distortions of competition as a consequence of governmental support for national market players to the detriment of competitors from other member states.

Article 107 TFEU generally prohibits state aid except for aid justified by reasons of general economic development. State aid can take different forms and is not limited to direct subsidies. In fact, in recent years the focus of state aid law has shifted towards the question of whether tax measures, financial guarantees or preferential commercial terms provided by a government may constitute state aid.

Any advantage, in any form whatsoever, that a state entity confers on a selective basis to certain undertakings or for the production of certain goods can in principle be state aid. In contrast, subsidies granted to individuals or general measures open to all companies do not fall into the application of article 107 TFEU. Hence, the criteria for assessing state aid are as follows:

- an intervention by the state or through state resources regardless of its form;
- that provides the beneficiary with an advantage on a selective basis that is not available to companies in comparable situations, eg, a grant for an individual company or a favourable measure for an industry sector or for businesses in defined regions;
- that has or may distort competition; and
- that is likely to affect trade between EU member states.

As the definition of state aid raises many questions in individual cases, the European Commission, who is in charge of ensuring that state aid complies with EU rules, in May 2016 published a Notice on the notion of state aid.<sup>1</sup> The Notice forms part of the Commission's State Aid Modernisation initiative that was launched in 2012. The overriding goal the Commission aims to achieve with the Notice and its other instruments is to provide guidance and legal certainty for companies and to focus its resources on the most problematic cases with the largest impact on the EU single market. The Notice on the notion of state aid provides general guidance on all aspects of the definition of state aid by summarising the Commission's decisional practice and the case law of the European courts.

While article 107(1) contains a general prohibition of state aid, EU state aid rules also accept that government intervention may in some instances be justified. According to article 107(2) and (3), state aid that supports a number of policy objectives, such as aid with a social character, aid for the promotion of culture and heritage or other goals, can be considered compatible with the single market. The General Block Exemption Regulation<sup>2</sup> (GBER) plays an important role in defining the scope of exceptions to the general prohibition of state aid as it exempts aid measures from prior notification if certain conditions are respected. According to the Commission's estimates roughly three-quarters of the state aid measures are exempted under the GBER.

If a state measure contains aid and no exemption applies, the measure needs to be notified to the Commission which will assess whether the measure can be justified individually and approved by the Commission as compatible with the internal market on that basis. If this is not the case, the Commission will take a so-called negative decision and require the member state to recover the aid with interest from the beneficiary. The aim of recovery is to remove the undue advantage granted to a beneficiary. There are only a few situations in which such recovery would not be required: where it would be contrary to a general principle of EU law (see section 6 below) or when the 10-year limitation period for recovery has passed. If a member state does not comply with the recovery decision in time, the Commission may directly refer it to the European Court of Justice (ECJ).

The discussion below highlights a number of key areas in which state aid enforcement has been particularly prominent in recent years but does not purport to be exhaustive.

State aid and tax

One area in which the European Commission has increased state aid enforcement significantly concerns national tax rulings. Fiscal measures have always been the subject of state aid scrutiny, as a favourable tax treatment by an authority may provide an undue advantage to certain companies or an industry sector, thus falling under the scope of article 107(1) TFEU. Since the end of the last century the interdependence between tax and state aid law has become a special focus of the Commission in light of increased tax competition between EU member states.<sup>3</sup>

Since the Commission adopted a series of decisions in 2002 and 2003 on national schemes which granted tax breaks to international groups of companies that based part of their activities in these member states, a recurrent issue has been the way in which tax authorities deal with transfer pricing. Transfer pricing relates to the prices companies charge for intra-group transactions, in particular between companies of the same group located in different countries. Since intra-group transactions do not take place on the market, tax authorities need to assess whether the price charged for these intra-group transactions is indeed comparable to a price that would have been paid on the market, to prevent groups of companies from using transfer pricing in order to move profits from high-tax to low-tax jurisdictions.

While tax authorities mainly assess transfer prices in order to verify that companies do not pay too little tax, in 2006 the Court of Justice held that if national tax authorities were to accept transfer prices that result in a lower taxable base, this could amount to state aid.<sup>4</sup> On this basis, the Commission has stated that article 107(1) TFEU implies an arm's length principle, ie, the requirement that tax authorities only accept transfer pricing methodologies that result in "a reliable approximation of a market-based outcome."<sup>5</sup>

Since 2013, the Commission has started investigations into rulings given by tax authorities in several member states concerning the transfer prices used by large corporations. This has resulted so far in decisions against Belgium,<sup>6</sup> Luxembourg,<sup>7</sup> the Netherlands<sup>8</sup> and Ireland,<sup>9</sup> all of which are being challenged before the General Court of the European Union. As an accompanying policy regarding its tax investigations, the Commission on 3 June 2016 issued a working paper on state aid and tax rulings.<sup>10</sup> In December 2016, in a case relating to a Spanish tax scheme, the Court of Justice supported the Commission's approach on selectivity which plays a central role in many tax cases. The Court set aside judgments of the General Court that had annulled two Commission decisions considering that the selectivity of a Spanish tax scheme had not been established in those decisions. The Court of Justice held that case law does not require the Commission to always identify a particular category of undertakings that exclusively benefit from a measure in order to demonstrate selectivity.<sup>11</sup>

It should be noted that tax rulings are not the only fiscal measures being scrutinised by the European Commission under state aid rules. Other tax measures that have been found by the Commission to constitute unlawful aid in the past few years include changes to the French tonnage tax regime,<sup>12</sup> an exemption from the aggregates levy in the UK,<sup>13</sup> tax exemptions offered to certain ports in the Netherlands<sup>14</sup> and the German scheme for the carry-forward of tax losses in the case of restructuring of companies in financial difficulty.<sup>15</sup>

State aid in the energy sector

A sector in which the Commission has been particularly active recently is the area of energy supply. In 2014, the Commission published its new Guidelines on state aid for environmental protection and energy (EEAG) for the period 2014-2020.<sup>16</sup> The EEAG promote the use of renewable energy sources but also aim to address market distortions that may arise from public support granted for this purpose.

European Renewable Energies Association (EREF) brought a challenge against the new guidelines. However, the General Court dismissed this application for annulment because of lack of standing in November 2015.<sup>17</sup> The Commission's assessment under the EEAG was nevertheless sanctioned by the General Court recently in a case concerning the Commission's objection to the exemption of heavy industry in Germany from surcharges in order to support renewable energy. The challenge mainly concerned the question of whether such an exemption constituted aid, rather than the Commission's assessment of the compatibility of such aid. The General Court wholly endorsed the Commission's analysis and rejected the application brought by Germany.<sup>18</sup>

Notably, while the Commission on 24 October 2016 approved<sup>27</sup> German plans to support high-efficiency cogeneration aimed at promoting energy efficiency, lower CO<sub>2</sub> emissions and leading to a better integration of cogenerated power into the electricity market, it also initiated an in-depth investigation into reductions for certain users from the surcharges imposed to finance the support.

In April 2015, the Commission opened its first-ever state aid sector inquiry into capacity mechanisms,<sup>28</sup> which resulted in an interim report in 2016.<sup>29</sup> According to the Commission, capacity mechanisms can increase security of electricity supply, but it must be more thoroughly assessed whether they are necessary, targeted and cost-effectively designed. In late 2016, the Commission approved, after an in-depth investigation, French plans for a capacity mechanism under state aid rules<sup>30</sup> which, in its amended version, is the first national plan committing to explicitly include and remunerate foreign capacities.

State aid for ports and airports

Another sector in which Commission enforcement has been particularly active is transport, in particular aviation and, to a lesser extent, maritime transport.

After a General Court judgment in 2000 confirmed that the operation and construction of an airport is an economic activity,<sup>31</sup> several investigations into aid to regional airports were initiated, most notably into the state aid provided to Belgium's Charleroi airport. The Commission's decision in that case,<sup>32</sup> despite its annulment by the General Court in 2008,<sup>33</sup> kicked off dozens of investigations into aid schemes for regional airports and the modernisation of regional airports in multiple member states.<sup>34</sup> In 2014 the Commission also adopted new guidelines for state aid to airports and airlines.<sup>35</sup>

In the maritime sector, specific guidelines have also applied for many years. One of the most interesting aspects is that they allow member states to introduce tax benefits for ship-owning companies, mainly to allow them to compete with non-EU countries trying to act as flag states. Recently, the Commission on this basis validated the prolongation of the tax exemption regimes for seafarers in Belgium,<sup>36</sup> Germany<sup>37</sup> and Sweden.<sup>38</sup>

Up until now, there were no block exemptions in the aviation and maritime sectors (and member states were therefore always required to notify aid measures they intended to grant). On 17 May 2017, after two rounds of consultation launched in 2016, the Commission approved the proposed extended scope of the GBER to ports and airports.<sup>39</sup> In the airport sector, public investments for the infrastructure of regional airports (with less than 3 million passengers per year) may be made without prior notification. Up to 75% of infrastructure costs for airports with less than 1 million passengers per year and up to 50% of infrastructure costs for airports with less than 3 million passengers per year are exempted from notification.

For maritime ports, public investments of up to €150 million in sea ports<sup>40</sup> and of up to €50 million in inland ports<sup>41</sup> may be made without prior notification. For these two categories, eligible costs are defined as investments for the construction, replacement or upgrade of port infrastructures, access infrastructure and dredging. In the case of maritime ports, up to 100% of the eligible costs where such costs are up to €20 million are exempted from notification, up to 80% of the eligible costs where such costs are above €20 million are exempted and up to 60% of the eligible costs where such costs are above €50 million are exempted. In the case of inland ports, up to 100% of the eligible costs are exempted up to a €50 million total envelope.

Aid for start-ups

A novelty in EU state aid law is the introduction in the GBER of a specific regime to facilitate access to public finance for start-up companies. Pursuant to this system, aid received by "unlisted small enterprises up to five years following registration which have not yet distributed profits and have not been formed through a merger"<sup>42</sup> is exempted from the notification requirement.

This new exemption is now increasingly used in the context of investment initiatives launched by member states through specific public hubs as it is seen as a convenient way to provide aid in excess of the de minimis cap of €200,000 on block-exempted aid pursuant to the Commission's De Minimis Regulation.<sup>43</sup>

While the former general block exemption regulation<sup>44</sup> contained references to start-ups, there was no clear cut definition of this concept under the state aid rules, and "start-ups" were not separately identified as a form of business eligible to receive specific aid as such. The strategy of the Commission's DG Competition, as described during the course of the consultation phase of the 2014 GBER, was specifically to simplify "scattered provisions for start-up aid [...] into a broad category of start-up aid, targeting the market failure of access to finance for all start-ups".<sup>45</sup>

In order to assess a company's eligibility to receive aid for start-ups, a four-step analysis is required. This involves checking whether the company: is a small enterprise; has less than five years' existence; has not distributed profits since its creation; and was not formed through a merger.

If a start-up is eligible, a number of different thresholds for the funding are in place and the aid may take a wide range of different forms. What renders aid for start-ups particularly attractive is that the thresholds are very clearly defined for a wide range of different tools. The different ceilings applicable may be doubled where the company qualifies as a small and innovative enterprise.

Other block exemption mechanisms may also enable young companies to receive public funding (such as aid for R&D projects, innovation aid and investment aid). However, the start-up category appears to be a very handy and comprehensive tool for young companies to obtain public funding.

Procedural developments

This last section focuses on procedural developments and companies' rights in state aid procedures. It should be kept in mind that in state aid cases the Commission and the member state concerned are the main parties to the procedure. The role of third parties including the beneficiary or a complainant is rather limited. Thus, it can be challenging for companies' arguments to be heard by the Commission.

There have been two recent developments regarding the Commission's rules for state aid procedures: the enhancement of the Commission's investigation tools in 2013<sup>46</sup> and the introduction of a new Procedural Regulation in 2015.<sup>47</sup>

First of all, in 2013, the Commission enhanced its investigation tools by introducing the ability to directly obtain information from undertakings. Prior to the modernization package, the procedural framework presented the Commission with a number of difficulties when gathering market information as it was largely dependent on the information provided by member states. Consequently, this put a significant administrative burden on member states which led to frequent delays. Even though under the Best Practices Code<sup>48</sup> the Commission could seek the cooperation of third parties after initiating a formal investigation process, this measure lacked teeth because the cooperation of third parties was voluntary.

The modernization package has addressed this shortfall by strengthening the Commission's powers so that once it has opened a formal investigation, it can obtain information by a simple request or decision from: (i) beneficiaries provided that the member state requesting the aid agrees;<sup>49</sup> and (ii) other undertakings and other member states if the information provided by the member state requesting the aid is not sufficient.<sup>50</sup> These enhanced investigatory powers came into force on 20 August 2013 and were codified in 2015 in the new Procedural Regulation. For the first time, these powers enabled the Commission to compel a response from third parties and to enforce compliance with fines for inaccurate or misleading information in a response to a simple request or decision and for delays in responding to a decision.<sup>51</sup>

Even though these changes do not absolve member states from showing that aid is compatible, they allow the Commission to look to other sources to obtain "factual company and market data and facts-based analysis of the functioning of the market."<sup>52</sup> The Commission recognises that these new measures must be applied proportionately (especially with regards to SMEs)<sup>53</sup> and can only relate to information that is at the other parties' disposal.<sup>54</sup>

In 2015, the Commission also streamlined its procedural rules by codifying, "in the interest of clarity and rationality,"<sup>55</sup> its earlier procedural rules in the new Procedural Regulation, which came into force on 14 October 2015. The Procedural Regulation provides rules for the notification of state aid, formal investigations, injunctions and recovery of aid deemed incompatible with the single market.

Finally, recent case-law of the CJEU reaffirmed the importance of state aid law and its potential consequences for companies in cases where an aid element is not identified on time, in particular when entering into contracts with government authorities. The CJEU's decision in Klausner Holz<sup>56</sup> of 2015 made it clear that even a final judgment having the force of res judicata cannot prevent the application of EU state aid law in a subsequent court procedure if a national court considers an agreement to contain an element of aid. There can also be no legitimate expectations for companies that relied on a final judgment that is contrary to the state aid rules. Thus, member states do not have any alternatives other than to strictly enforce state aid law. Companies are well advised to obtain state aid law advice prior to entering into any agreements with state entities that might include an aid element.

Hogan Lovells is a global legal practice that helps corporations, financial institutions and government entities across the spectrum of their critical business and legal issues globally and locally. We have over 2,500 lawyers operating out of more than 45 offices in the United States, Europe, Latin America, the Middle East, Africa, Australia and Asia.

Our state aid team in Brussels will guide you through the jungle of EU state aid law – regardless of whether your company is incorporated in the EU or abroad. We help you understand the implications of EU state aid on your business and how you can benefit from government funding in a compliant way. We also represent clients in EU Commission investigations and national and EU Court proceedings, both as beneficiaries and as complainants regarding aid for competitors.
